Chapter XI

Our Life in Consecrated Chastity

Chapter 11 of our constitutions, as we read it, presents the call to chastity as a means towards a life of freedom and grace. The law of chastity is imposed on every human, in marriage and outside of marriage. Unchastely in thought and desire as well as in word and in deed, is seriously wrong primarily because it transgresses the law of God. Our vow of consecrated chastity, which we have voluntarily chosen from the preferential love of God and in Him of every person, adds the obligation of the virtue of religion to abstain from all indulgence of sexual pleasure. In addition it imposes the obligation of celibacy, the state of being unmarried. Often times, in church usage, celibacy refers to one who has never been married. The Constitutions urges the cultivation of an intense relationship with the Blessed Virgin Mary. She alone has not inherited a tainted nature through original sin. Original sin and its consequences in our fallen nature manifest themselves more in inclinations to unchastity than in any other way.

In the Sermon on the Mount, Christ condemned not only adultery but everything that leads up to it – all impure looks, desires, thoughts and actions. Our Constitutions in N. 171 reaffirms our need for recourse to supernatural and natural means to maintain equilibrium and avoid the dangers that threaten our celibate life, such as boredom, loneliness, love of comforts and the immoderate and improper use of the media. Trinitarian theology is the basis of all healthy relationships. Chapter XI does so in N.169, 2, by referring to chastity for the sake of Christ as a reflection of the infinite love binding the three divine persons.

The call to chastity should have as its source and goal to be in relationship. Taking up this vow should never bind, hinder, or limit us. Rather, it should serve to liberate, free, and inspire us towards a life of incredible joy emanating from true and plentiful relationships with our Capuchin brothers, and the wider world. This vow has not been easy, but we are told “affective and sexual maturity gradually travels a path of conversion from a self-centered and possessive love to one that is self-sacrificing and capable of giving itself to others.” When we struggle with this vow, we have to remind ourselves that this is a journey of constant conversion. We have to look within ourselves and wonder whether our impulses are self-centered or self-sacrificing. Truth be told, they are usually the former. This is where we find an opportunity for growth, and a real dependence on God's grace and mercy. The goal, we suppose, is to one day "give witness of a love that is gratuitous and universal.

Saint Francis "captivated by a love for God and for all peoples, indeed for all created beings, is a brother and a friend of all. He was noted for the richness of his affections and his capacity to express them." We desire to have just a little of Francis' ability to love. Francis clung to nothing, even his sexuality. He struggled for sure, but he gave us a model of conversion that leads to amazing freedom. Pope Francis has called on religious men and women to "wake up the world." We find that our call to consecrated chastity is a vehicle towards deep, authentic relationships that will help us to engage a world that is often asleep when presented with freely given authentic love.
